Interview

Santosh of Nepal

We asked Santosh of Nepal about his hometown of Baglung, festivals, his occupation, difficulties in everyday life, and what he hopes to do in the future.

Santosh and his wife, Sujata

नमस्ते Namaste! ("Hello" In Nepalese)

Ghimire Santosh came to Japan 15 years ago with his family after graduating from high school.

UCIA: What kind of place is your hometown, Baglung?

Santosh: There are the high mountains of the Himalayas, rivers flowing, and the nature is beautiful. Buckwheat and rice are produced. I walked eight hours to reach a place where cars are driven.

UCIA: We've heard that there are many festivals in Nepal. What kind of festivals are there in February?

Santosh: According to Nepal's Vikram history, when it is February in Japan, it is October in Nepal. On the day we begin our studies in October, we honor Saraswati, the goddess of learning, and as a family, we pray for our studies to progress smoothly and for good results.

UCIA: Did you know about Japan before coming here?

Santosh: Japanese dramas, "Doraemon," and "Crayon Shin-chan" were broadcast in Nepal, so I often watched them and imagined Japanese culture and society were like.

UCIA: What kind of work are you doing?

Santosh: I run two restaurants and one seasonings shop. We named the shop "Todoroki 8848" with the meaning of Utsunomiya's thunder and the high Himalayans. I interpret for a lawyer. I was a consultant at TIA for six years and was the former chairman of the Non-Resident Nepali Association.

UCIA: Have you ever had difficulties in daily life?

Santosh: When I couldn't yet speak Japanese and got on the bus, I put money in the money exchange machine and thought I received change, so got off the bus without paying the fare. Various services are automated in Japan, so I wasn't sure how to operate them.

UCIA: Is there something you want to do in the future?

Santosh: I love Utsunomiya and think of it as my second hometown. While expanding my business, I would like to volunteer to support Nepalese people and teach them Japanese customs.

UCIA: Santosh, धन्यवाद! Dhan'yavāda! (Thank you!)
